

ABSTRACT

A device adapted to protect integrated circuits from reverse engineering comprising a part looking like a via connecting two metal layers, but in fact attached only to one metal layer and spaced from the other. Having such "trick" via would force a reverse engineer to think there is a connection where there is none. A method for fabricating such device.